

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book could not have existed without the many students that we each have known and worked with along the way. In particular, we thank Tasmiah Amreen for her contributions to the book. Tasmiah interviewed Shane Barker, Jill Wheeler, Terrance Boyd, and Shauna Morimoto in order to more thoroughly integrate their voices into this book, and it was through Tasmiah's careful questioning that Herzog was able to translate their helpful verbal advice into text. Christina Williams and DeAndre' Beadle participated in independent studies on emerging adulthood scholarship, during which both provided insights about the applicability of these studies for navigating one's own college decisions.

Several additional students assisted with research on young people or regularly talked during office hours in ways that indirectly affected this book, including Tatianna Balis, Sanjana Vengupal, Tiffany Hood, Bryn Smernoff, Alexis Rizzolo, Olivia Tzeng, Nicole Breaux, Jada Holmes, Melissa Conry, Kristen Eldridge, Andrew Garcia, Emily Lau, Catherine Talor, Seth Washishpak, Rhyker Dye, Zina Hardin, Olivia Chambers, Bradley Reed, Caylin Craig, Jacob Fluech, Stephanie Collier, Chao Liu, Ashley Wagner, Elizabeth Word, James Brown, Angela Cox, Carrie Nelms, Randi Combs, Connor Thompson, April Moore, Emma Thompson, Grant King, Camille Wildburger, Zanaib Shipchandler, Mark Trainer, Xiannan Lu, Gabriel David, Angela Wu, Richard Woo, Jessica Technow, Marie Sanchez, Robbee Wedow, Kaitlyn Conway, Molly Kiernan, Scott Mitchell, Josh Cook, Molly Kring, Chris Gonzales, Scott Hurley, Josh Cook, Caitlin Smith, Janice James, Allison VenderBroek, Jennifer Jesse, Michael Thompson, and Michelle Saucedo.

In the later stages of the book, the following students also contributed insights from navigational discussions: Jamie Goodwin, Julia Kohl, Tiara Dungy, Haley Turisi, Andy Williams, Jin Ai, Dana Doan, and Bryan Fegley. Several unnamed students also helped contribute insights regarding the ways that emerging adults can get lost during the process of college, and the motivation behind needing to articulate in this book how better to navigate crucial decisions and challenging experiences in ways that are authentic and meaningful.

We also are tremendously grateful for the institutional support provided for this book. Most notably, Anna Zajicek and the Department of Sociology and Criminology at the University of Arkansas contributed a substantial portion of the costs to allow this book to be provided as an open resource, which eliminates cost barriers to students who we hope will greatly benefit from its insight and advice. This also allows instructors to be able to adopt the book in college courses, especially first-year seminars and general education courses, without risking adding to potential financial barriers for college during that crucial first year of acclimation.

Additionally, Linda Coon and the Honors College at the University of Arkansas also subsidized the open access costs in order to support high-achieving students in navigating college in ways that support formation and articulation of professional identities, which is a precursor to winning undergraduate research grants and other student awards.

Moreover, the “people power” of the co-authorship team would not have been possible without the support of Todd Shields and Yvette Murphy-Erby in the J. William Fulbright College of Arts and Sciences at the University of Arkansas, in which six of the authors were located. We are also indebted to Ro Di Brezzo and the Office of the Provost at the University of Arkansas for supporting the first-year seminar course that led to this book’s creation.

Our own mentors and advisors were instrumental in guiding our earlier college navigations, and we thank the colleagues in each of our academic units for the ongoing support they provide, especially in co-advising the students about which we care so dearly.

Last but not least, we thank the three anonymous reviewers and the Oxford University Press editors for their extensive feedback on the manuscript. Their thoughtful and helpful advice greatly enriched the material and underscored the benefits of a community of scholars. Despite these tremendous contributions to this book, we retain any remaining errors as our own.

It is worth noting that this book is meant to launch many different directions for navigating college, and we hope it opens discussions for how best to do that more than it firmly closes doors or forevermore answers questions. We aim for students to be able to launch from the ideas in this book into face-to-face and online encounters with the many caring faculty and student support staff available on college campuses. On their behalf, we want this book to be a sign of the deep commitment we have to your success. We're here to help navigate.

With gratitude,
Patricia Herzog, Casey Harris, Shauna Morimoto, Shane Barker, Jill Wheeler, Justin Barnum, and Terrance Boyd
